This contribution to the subject is addressed to teachers who are seeking a way to bring about or foster in their classes the initiative and independence that modern education demands. It is a small attempt toward making the schools safe for democracy. Now, the vital thing about socialized or democratized class-work is not at all the form of procedure, but the spirit and attitude of the pupils. The form in which the class carries on its work may vary infinitely, and yet the interchange and crystallization of ideas, the discussion and planning, and all the give-and-take of group life can not go on at random. Just in proportion to the energy and complexity of the initiative is the need for orderly procedure. Form, restraint and control, if they come from within, do not hamper initiative, but heighten it, and give it range and scope. In a well-organized parliamentary body, for example, each member has a chance to make himself heard and to influence events in proportion to his ability, while in the formless mob the individual is submerged and genuine initiative lost. But this very necessity for form and method makes it hard to describe the procedure without so fixing attention on it that the more precious thing, the spirit of it, slips out between the words.
