Excerpt: .it consists of one long, straggling street, which runs parallel to the beach, and wherever a ravine comes down, the houses are piled up on each side of it. The rounded hills, being only partially protected by a very scanty vegetation, are worn into numberless little gullies, which expose a singularly bright red soil. From this cause, and from the low whitewashed houses with tile subject has lately been treated excellently by Mr. Hayes, in the Boslon Journal (o. iv. p. 426). The author does not appear aware of a case published by me (Geographical Journal, vol. ix. p. 5:28), of a gigantic boulder embedded in an iceberg in the Antarctic Ocean, almost certainly one hundred mill s distant l rom any land, and perhaps much more distant. In the Appendix I have discussed at k-igth, the probability (at rbat time hardly thought of) of...
