But it was impossible for the keen eye of the trained observer not to be aware that the wind had changed in the capitalists headquarters. There was more talk of eventualities, more rumours about rifles. There was evidently money going, but where it came from Jeanne did not know, nor did she care particularly to inquire. Her inner circle of the Libyan League now numbered five hundred men; three hundred were well at home in the saddle, and, what was more important, had a saddle in which to leap at a moments notice. Always Jeanne preached in the Sentinel on the duty of self-reliance. The men at the head of the Reform movement, and who had the handling of Cecils money, were not exactly the stuff of which revolutionists were...
